| Breakout to within 2.3% of 52W highs on 2.62x volume with RS line at new high-classic technical leadership signal. Forward catalyst is Nov 9 earnings (48d), where guidance on AI agent adoption and GenAI-driven CCaaS (contact center as a service) expansion will be key; sector rotation into cloud infrastructure beneficiaries ahead of 2027 enterprise AI budgets is the macro tailwind.                                                                                                                                                                                                                          |

| This is a textbook Qullamaggie A-grade setup: RS line at new high (the #1 early leadership signal), +92.7 RS vs SPY (elite), prox_52w at 97.7% (breakout zone), volume >2.5x, and above both 20MA and 50MA. The base is wider than ideal (4.52 ATR) but acceptable given the RS confirmation. The strongest disconfirming evidence: macro regime is large-cap led (SMID facing crosswinds), and the stock is in Technology sector which is already extended (+8% vs SPY this week), risking a sector pause. However, the RS line new high overrides this-Five9 is leading within the leading sector. Conviction: High. |

| Riskified provides AI-powered fraud prevention and chargeback guarantee solutions for e-commerce merchants, taking on merchant risk in exchange for a percentage of approved transactions. The company benefits from rising online fraud complexity (synthetic identity, account takeover) and merchant willingness to outsource fraud risk as AI attack vectors proliferate.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |

In Communications sector (second-best this week at -0.6% vs SPY), earning +0.5 sector boost. The strongest disconfirming evidence: micro-cap ($930M) in a large-cap-led regime faces liquidity and flow risk-one institutional seller can reverse the move. Also, the stock is still 30% below its 2021 highs, so this is a recovery trade, not a true leader. Conviction: Medium-High-technical setup is pristine, but size and macro regime cap conviction. |

| Sharp 35.7% move on extremely elevated volume (19.14x) signals likely corporate event (partnership/trial data leak/FDA update) though not publicly disclosed. Forward catalyst is Oct 28 earnings (36d out), where pipeline updates on VK2735 (GLP-1 agonist) Phase 2/3 trials could drive next leg; PDUFA/regulatory milestones in 2027 are the macro pathway.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        |

| Viking is developing VK2735, a dual GLP-1/GIP receptor agonist for obesity and metabolic diseases, competing in the white-hot weight-loss drug market dominated by Novo Nordisk and Eli Lilly. The company has Phase 2 data showing competitive efficacy; a successful Phase 3 readout or partnership would be transformational for this $4.8B market cap.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            |

| Massive volume and 35% move into 52W highs (94.7% proximity) is textbook event-driven breakout, but the wide base (7.28 ATR) and absence of RS line new high disqualify it from A-grade-this is a gap-and-run on news, not a structured VCP coil. The strongest disconfirming evidence: RS vs SPY is only +2.1 (weak relative strength), and the stock is 45% off its true 52W high from earlier in the year, meaning it's recovering lost ground rather than leading. Biotech binary risk is extreme. Conviction: Medium-own it as a event-driven trade into Oct 28 earnings with tight stops, not a momentum leader. |

| Textbook VCP coil breakout: base_tight 1.55 ATR (elite compression), 2.72x volume, 93.6% of 52W high. Likely driven by TiO2 pricing recovery and China production discipline. Forward catalyst is Nov 5 earnings (44d), where updated TiO2 pricing and volume guidance (construction and coatings demand) will be key; macro catalyst is any further China stimulus or U.S. infrastructure spend acceleration.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |

| Kronos is a leading producer of titanium dioxide (TiO2) pigment used in paints, coatings, plastics, and paper. The company is levered to global construction and manufacturing activity; TiO2 pricing is cyclical and driven by supply discipline (especially from Chinese producers) and end-market demand recovery.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                |

| Exposure to industrial recovery and commodity pricing (construction, manufacturing). Theme momentum is decelerating slightly as China stimulus hopes fade, but any new infrastructure push (U.S. or abroad) would be a tailwind. Not a secular growth theme-this is a cyclical value play on TiO2 pricing stabilization.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             |

| Earnings on November 5. Consensus not provided, but Kronos is a cyclical commodity play-earnings are driven by TiO2 realized pricing and volume rather than operational beats. A positive pricing update or volume acceleration would re-rate the stock; a pricing decline would kill the thesis.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    |

| Thesis invalid on a close back below $8.10 (breakout pivot from the 1.55 ATR base), or on any TiO2 pricing weakness or demand guidance cut at the Nov 5 print. Commodity cyclical risk: exogenous China supply surge or global construction slowdown would reverse the trade.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |

| This has the tightest base in the entire scan (1.55 ATR-textbook VCP) and is 93.6% of 52W high with clean volume, but it lacks the RS line new high and is a cyclical commodity play in a sector (Basic Materials) that is not leading this week. RS +25.8 is solid but not elite. Grade is B (not A) because RS line is not at new high and this is a value/cyclical recovery, not a growth momentum leader. The strongest disconfirming evidence: Kronos is a tiny, illiquid commodity stock in a large-cap-led regime-institutional follow-through is uncertain, and one bad TiO2 pricing datapoint kills it. Conviction: Medium-beautiful technical setup, but lack of secular theme and illiquidity limit edge. |

| Breakout to 90.1% of 52W high on 2.28x volume with 2.71 ATR base (clean coil). Likely driven by labor market data (jobless claims, temp staffing surveys) signaling demand inflection. Forward catalyst is Nov 2 earnings (41d), where temp staffing volume and bill rate trends (construction, logistics, light industrial) will be critical; macro catalyst is any Fed pivot or U.S. manufacturing PMI acceleration.                                                                                                                                                                                                           |

| TrueBlue provides staffing and workforce solutions (temp and contingent labor) across blue-collar sectors: construction, logistics, warehousing, hospitality. The company is a pure cyclical play on labor demand; revenue and margins are directly tied to U.S. hiring activity and wage inflation in tight labor markets.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      |

| Exposure to U.S. labor market recovery and cyclical hiring inflection. Theme momentum is decelerating (recent jobless claims mixed, manufacturing PMI still sub-50), so this is contrarian positioning ahead of a potential turn. Not a secular theme-this is a tactical value/cyclical trade.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   |

| Earnings on November 2 (41 days, earliest in this scan). Consensus not provided, but TrueBlue is a show-me story-guidance on temp staffing volume and fill rates is the only thing that matters. A positive inflection (volume acceleration, margin expansion) would re-rate the stock 20%+; flat or declining trends would kill the thesis.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     |

| Solid B-grade: tight base (2.71 ATR), prox_52w 90.1%, RS +43.5 (strong), volume >2x. Lacks RS line new high and is a micro-cap cyclical in Industrials (not a leading sector). Nov 2 earnings (earliest catalyst in the scan) is a near-term risk/reward inflection. The strongest disconfirming evidence: staffing is a lagging indicator, not a leading one-if this is breaking out, the labor cycle turn may already be priced; also, IWM is down -4% vs SPY, signaling small-cap risk-off. Conviction: Medium-clean technical setup and early earnings catalyst, but cyclical and illiquid, requiring tight risk management. |

| 8.1% move on 3.64x volume to 92.4% of 52W high, likely driven by life science capital equipment demand recovery or partnership/contract announcement. Forward catalyst is Nov 4 earnings (43d), where lab equipment order trends and biopharma capex guidance will be key; macro catalyst is any acceleration in biotech funding (VC, IPO market) or pharma R&D budgets in 2027.                                                                                                                                                        |

| Cytek manufactures full-spectrum flow cytometry instruments used in life science research, drug discovery, and clinical diagnostics. The company competes with BD Biosciences and Beckman Coulter, with differentiation in spectral (vs. conventional) flow technology that enables higher-parameter cell analysis at lower cost.                                                                                                                                                                                                       |

| Exposure to biotech/pharma R&D recovery and life science capital equipment cycle. | RS +27.7 is decent but not elite; 3.64x volume suggests informed buying. No insider buying in the last 60 days. Large float (102.9M) for a small-cap ($740M) provides liquidity but also requires sustained institutional buying. Ownership data not available; cross-reference for T. | Earnings on November 4. Consensus not provided, but Cytek is a show-me story post-2023 life science capex slowdown. A beat + guide raise (especially instrument placements or consumables attach) would re-rate the stock; flat/declining orders would confirm the downturn continues.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  |

| B-grade: prox_52w 92.4%, volume >3.5x, RS +27.7, above 20MA and 50MA, but base is wide (5.15 ATR) and RS line is not at new high. Life science tools are early-cycle but theme is still weak. The strongest disconfirming evidence: CTKB is still 8% below 52W high and biotech capex has not inflected yet-this could be a head-fake breakout if the Nov 4 print disappoints. Also, small-cap healthcare in a large-cap-led regime faces headwinds. Conviction: Medium-solid technical setup but theme and macro timing are uncertain. |
